

A NOTE FROM NICK

Thank you for keeping the questions alive.

To the person who chose to support Jasmonate.com,

I want this page to become a home for people who cannot stop asking questions about jasmonates and jasmonic acid. There is an entire world of ideas here. I want to make it easier to explore, one carefully read paper and one clear explanation at a time.

Your support helps me continue the educational publishing, primary-source reading and everyday site upkeep behind Jasmonate.com. It gives this independent project room to keep improving. Thank you for choosing to be part of that.

I am excited about where jasmonate science could go. I also believe the science has to earn every claim we make for it. The ambition is to stay curious, make the sources easy to find, and be honest about what is still unknown.

This October, the pink ribbon is here in recognition of breast cancer awareness and with respect for everyone whose life it touches. Hope deserves careful science and clear words. That is the spirit I want to bring to this page.

Thank you for your encouragement, your curiosity and the time you spend here. I hope the next question you find on Jasmonate.com leads you to a paper, an idea or a conversation worth having.
